Learning vector quantization constitutes a powerful and intuitive method for nearest prototype classification. The performance of prototype based classification techniques highly depends on the underlying distance measure, since it defines how the data items are compared and how they are grouped in clusters. Optimizing the metric for the specific training data is a powerful approach to improve the accuracy of LVQ algorithms. In this talk, I will speak about recent approaches for metric adaptation in LVQ and present several applications.